This publication presents proceedings from a seminar on confidence issues that relate to corporate governance, effective risk management ethical behaviour, integrity and transparency, especially as it pertain to consumers, operators and regulators of the financial services sector. It is a collection of pragmatic evaluation and conclusions of captains of the financial services industries, who gathered to critically review developments in the sector in a seminar with the theme, "Trust Rendering Policy: Reworking Nigeria's Financial System in the Face of Global Reform", held on March 10, 2010. The seminar, which was designed and delivered by FITC in partnership with AME&T Group S.A, was packaged to facilitate a multi stakeholder approach to contributions. FITC chose to present the animated and very insightful session in this volume in an almost unedited manner to stimulate reading and give readers a feel of the sessions. The event was partly sponsored by the Central bank of Nigeria (CBN).

The high quality of the Journal of Banking and Finance is increasingly becoming the preferred reference material for both local and international scholars, as well as operators, as well as operators in the practice of finance. In this edition, readers have the benefit of gaining uncommon insight on the fundamentals of transformational leadership, the dynamics of business re-engineering in organisation performance and the nexus between political leadership and sub-optimal performance of the country's Development Finance Institutions (DFIs). For all who are interested in or being served by the banking and finance industry, the papers on interest rate deregulation and Automated Teller machine (ATM) offer robust perspectives that deepen understanding. This edition is a must-read for all stakeholders of the Financial services sector and economy in general.

Established in 1981, FITC was mandated to provide human capital development services to mitigate the challenge of dearth of managerial capacity in the Financial Services sector, back in 1976. At its inception, the expectations of the founding fathers of FITC were very high. This monograph documents how the expectations have so far been met over the first 30 years of operation. The book, "FITC Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow", is not just a piece of narratives, but a compendium of educative and instructive paradigms in organisational development, strategic management, succession planning and corporate governance. Herein, the reader will draw invaluable lessons in capacity building, institutional branding and visioning. The work is a complete masterpiece and a good reference document to existing and upcoming firms that are especially saddled with the task of dispensing professional services. It is recommended for all professional associations and institutions, professional services firms, banks and non-bank financial institutions, regulatory institutions, financial policy analysts, human Resources practitioners, social Science students and all who are interested in seeking or advancing knowledge and career in the financial services sector, within and outside Nigeria.

Whereas many organisations and countries in Europe and America have benefited immensely from the contribution of gender analysis to management practice, such cannot be said of Africa. It is against this backdrop that FITC embarked on a study to scientifically investigate, analyse and report the dynamics of gender relations management in the Nigerian workplace. With data sourced from 59 companies across 11 sectors of the economy, this monograph scopes the problems of gender equality, equity and diversity in the Nigerian workplace, suggesting a way forward in terms of both policy advocacy and practice, against the backdrop of global best practices. Thus the book, "Gender Relations Management in the Workplace: The Nigerian Experience" remains a very important reference material for organisations (or individuals) that seeks to grow their knowledge on the theory and practice of gender relations management.
